Re: Letter dated July 10, 2017

Dear Mr. Ross:

Thank you for your letter.

First, let me say that I've complied with your letter and removed the offending material to your mental health. I'd hate to disturb the balance in your World where it is completely fine to attack those who have you blocked and muted on Social Media, or those where you swore in front of a Judge to leave alone, to share their opinion of you and your activities. I'm sorry.

Second, let me state that I've taken it one step further. I've removed every tweet, favorite, and direct message that could or even might pertain to you. I've also removed any speech about you on Facebook and Instagram that I or others have privately stated about you and your activities.

Last night I decided that over the past 30 months, I have wasted more time and effort defending myself against you for events in which you had no standing than I have through two divorces. That stops today.

I'm not going to request you delete any materials about me because we both know it's a wasted effort. You will continue attack me from behind a block on Twitter for literally anything I say to others. You believe you have a fundamental right to attack those with varying, even to the point of making statements on behalf of sexual partners that "they wouldn't fuck me unless I ruffed them". Comments like those are perfectly acceptable, but heaven forbid someone comment about your physical state and mannerisms when they've met you in person. I can see how you'd want to stop said person from then trying to depose that sexual partner for their obvious slanderous comment, if they existed.

I will however ask that you start to respect the Twitter terms of service and refrain from trying to initiate conversations with those you have blocked. Specifically, Kathleen Smith, Ann Bibby, Janice Funston, and of course myself. We realize you require attention, although negative, to get by. Fact is, we don't want to participate and we'd greatly appreciate if you didn't either.

Sincerely,

Peter Skinner
